TELEGRAPH LINES ARE TIED UP BY AURORA BOREALIS

Telegraph messages sent into and out of Chicago last night were seriously delayed by earth currents thrown out by the aurora boreals. The Western Union company had so much work piled up by the disturbance that some of its operators had to work twelve hour shifts, or longer.

The tie-up affected wires all over the country. At New York, San Francesco and Atlanta main trunk lines were only partly serviceable for several hours. Operators reported that the familiar "fading" or intermittent finding and loss of sound on the instruments held down their speed. The disturbance was said to be the worst in years.

Among those who experienced difficulty on account of the conditions was the weather bureau. Their messages from bities in many parts of the country were as much as an hour late. The aurora borealis, the phenomena of which are not well understood, clogs the telegraph circuits on an average about twice a year. The tieup of last night is said to have affected the European cables as well as the land wires.
